DISCOVER:: The AMAZING Story Of Everything Changed Once We Met And Exchanged Numbers *****

Harriet glanced at the clock. It was almost 6:00 AM. She was working in the diner, and had gotten into the habit every morning of watching a man she had a crush on as he ran past the window. He was like clockwork, and sometimes he would glance in the window and smile at her. She sighed, staring at the window, when finally he ran past and waved inside. She waved back, smiling widely, and then he was gone and she felt like a silly little child with a school girl crush.

That was all right though. She was allowed her crushes. It wasn't like she was dating anybody. She worked insanely busy hours and didn't have a whole lot of time for socializing. And even if she did, she was painfully shy and hardly ever got around to gathering up courage to talk to people she liked. It was probably because she had always been a big girl, and bullies were always being cruel and putting her down.

Fortunately, she had worked at the diner since high school, and was very close with everyone who worked there. The owner was particularly fond of her, and frequently asked her before anyone else if she wanted extra hours. It was a comfortable life, and she was happy with it, but something was missing and she felt empty and hollow. She didn't have anyone to feel close to, and was sad consistently. It was lonely indeed, but she was getting used to the solitude, so she tried not to let it bother her too much.

Still, she couldn't help but fantasize that one day, the man who ran past the window would take an interest in her, and she would be completely swept away by his kindness and romanticism.
